"Rolf in the Woods." By Ernest Thompson-Seton. Doubleday, Page & Company, of New York. $1.50.

This book relates the adventures of a boy scout with Indian Quonah and little dog Shookum. Its text is illustrated with 200 drawings by Ernest Thompson-Seton, government naturalist of Manitoba and chief of the Boy Scout movement in America.

Rolf, the boy scout, who is the hero of the present volume, was a Connecticut born boy, adopted by Michael Kittering when he was left an orphan. Michael had a farm near the little port town of Myones, and Rolf was a valuable helper on his farm, but Michael was cruel and overbearing by disposition, and Rolf soon found that he could not stay in his uncle's house. So he took refuge with a friendly Indian, Quonah, who lived in the woods not far from Michael Kittering's farm. The boy got employment enough to pay for his board, and soon he and Quonah became devoted allies and friends.

Disturbed by the animosity of the little Connecticut community, however, the boy and the Indian concluded to go to the woods north of Lake George, near the Canadian line, and trap furs, for which there was a steady and increasing demand. So the two, the boy and the Indian, shouldered their few possessions, and accompanied by their little dog Shookum, bade adieu to Connecticut, and sunrise took, where Quonah took his drum and went to sing his sunrise hymn of worship in the morning.

Farther and farther through the forest went the two whom the adverse circumstances of life had brought together as comrades. From the Indian, gentle, patient and skillful, the boy learned how to camp in the wilderness and how to hunt game for food, how to prepare and cook it, he learned also much of the ways of the forest folk, and the laws which govern their intercourse. And the boy forgot his old life and the sting of its bitterness, and grew strong and happy searching beside Quonah, or sleeping in a couch of balsam boughs at night.

When they reached Lake George they made the acquaintance of a Dutch farmer's family, the Van Trumps. Quonah and Rolf helped them to tramp through his harvest, and made some money to buy winter supplies.

When the winter came in hand the Indian and the dog went far and built a substantial log cabin where game was abundant. The bear-hunting animals promised to trap for the winter, and Quonah was the best and the most fearless of teachers, and the adventures and dangers in which he and Rolf shared were just the things that the boy needed to make him brave, manly and self-controlled, to endow him with keen, swift vision, endurance and the habit of living simply and hardily according to upright and fearless standards.

The winter proved a success in the matter of Rolf's training and in the matter of trapping. The furs, sold at first to a store trader, afterward brought better prices in Albany. Then later came the War of 1812, and Rolf and Quonah did trusted and honorable scout service in the American Army, and helped to render Micoud's victory at Lake Erie a perfect triumph.

Rolf came out of the war with the marks of honorable conflict on his body, and with a new life, gratitude for the saving of his life, forged between him and Quonah. He went on to the fulfillment of his life's promise, happiness, and set a splendid example for all the Boy Scouts of America to follow.

In short, Mr. Thompson-Seton has written a great book, one which every American boy ought to get "for keeps" as his very own.

BOOK NOTES.

A new Dartmoor novel by Eden Phillpotts, which will be brought out in America by John Lane Company, will have an American interest in it, as two of its characters are to be American prisoners, put for safe keeping at Dartmoor, in the war between this country's colonists and England. There is a feeling of interest as well as curiosity to see the fusion of American independence with the sturdy stand-offishness of a community which Eden Phillpotts has rendered famous.

The home of the novelist known in the literary world of England as Lucas Mallet, and among her friends as Mrs. St. Leger Harrison, the daughter of Charles Kingsley, is at Eversley, Berkshire, England, and is a place with roses. Lucas Mallet is a most careful and painstaking writer and departs from usual fictional conventions to carry out her artistic ideas. But her new novel, "Adrian Savage," is said to have a happy ending and a present century background. The action of the story is carried forward partly in Paris and partly in the South of England. It touches a wide range of thought and interest in the twentieth century development of thought, art, and the position of women.

Announced for the last of July, is a new novel by W. J. Locke, called "The Glory of Clementina." John Lane Company will publish the book. The heroine of the book is said to be an uncommonly strong type in fiction. Mrs. Henry de la Pasture has chosen for "Master Christopher," put on the book market by E. P. Dutton and Company.

Readers who first learned to appreciate Mrs. Humphry Ward through her "Robert Elsmere" will be glad to know that "Doubleday and Page are to publish in the autumn a novel, "The Case of Richard Meynell," in which Mrs. Ward returns to the characters of "Robert Elsmere." Alfred Ollivant, the delightful author of "Bob, Son of Bat," will contribute to the September output of noted novels one to be entitled "The Taming of John Blunt."
